

This cartoon represents the outsourcing of labor and production. It depicts the two most powerful countries, China and the USA, overlooking a factory of no-name workers who are manufacturing the world.

It is supposed to illustrate the detriment of globalization, where the hunt for cheaper labor has led to exploitation of smaller, developing countries.

The US and China are using smaller countries for labor in order to get richer themselves, especially with big corporations.

This cartoon represents the positive effect of globalization, namely interdependence. This illustrates how the US is benefiting from the specializations of other countries.

The international relations which allow us to trade with other countries have allowed a large flow of goods, services, and revenue in a way that the US couldn't have made alone.

This shows a press conference where the US is presenting the idea of 5-star, interdependent trade, and the press is going crazy with excitement because money and specialized goods and services are flying into the country.
